When we were having lunch recently, we were startled when we heard our friends tell us that a fence between them and their waterfront has already begun. We were of the impression that we could write to you and that you would consider our position. Is it already too late?

We have been living here at 240 DayStar Place for over twenty years. Never once in all these years has there been any objection to what went on between us and the water. The shoreline has been washed away for more than fifty feet. We built a retaining wall to prevent further loss, and that without any help from the bureau.

It appears that something that has happened around other developments by the Bureau has created the need to change our use. Why should we be made to abide by rules that do not apply here?

If, indeed, it is not too late, we would urge you to take serious consideration to this legislation. You have heard the expression..."Never lock the barn until the horse is gone." This seems to be locking the barn when there is nothing to escape.

Yours truly
Mr. And Mrs. Glenn Loomis
